

PRODUCTION TAX GIVEN COUNTIES

Creek County Gets $104,137
for First Quarter.

CARTER COUNTY IS SECOND

Noble County Shows Largest Increase.

Checks were mailed to thirty-one Oklahoma counties today by State Auditor E. B. Howard in payment of the counties' share of gross production tax for the first quarter of the fiscal year. One-third of the tax obtained through the levy on oil, gas, lead and zinc is returned to the counties in which the revenue is produced.

The largest check for the quarter goes to Creek county, which obtains $104,137.03 of the disbursement. Carter county ranks second with $52,325.78 and Tulsa county third with $32,896.57. Noble county, in which the new Billings field is situated is situated showed the largest proportionate increase over last quarter. For the previous quarter Noble county's share of the tax was $21.38. The check mailed today for Noble county was $1,535.32. A large increase also was shown by Payne county, which jumped from $5,102.44 to $12,038.56.

The smallest check out was to Lincoln county. A total gross production tax of $180 was paid in this county last month, making the disbursement to the county 60 cents.

REVELATIONS OF A WIPE By Adele Garrison

Why Madge Was Startled When She Saw the Man for Whom Grace
Draper Was Looking, Enter the Restaurant.

I HAD barely time to drop my eyes from my scrutiny of Grace Draper's face when she turned around from the table which she shared with Harry Underwood in the cafe thronged with Latin-Americans to which Lillian Underwood had brought Katherine Sonnot and myself, and swept our table with the same searching glance she had bestowed upon many others in the cafe. That she was watching for some one I was very sure from her manner. For a swift panic-stricken moment the thought crossed my mind that perhaps I was the object of her search. Then sanity returned to me, and I realized that it was impossible she could have guessed I would be in this cafe, of whose existence I had not heard until I entered its doors. But another thought made me inwardly quake with terror.

Would she recognize me? This was the question that rang through my brain as if it were the brazen clangor of a bell. Lillian had carefully disguised Katherine and herself and me as South American women much older than we really were, and I was sure that we would pass any ordinary scrutiny. Katherine and Lillian had their backs toward her, and were therefore safe, but I sat facing her with Mr. Cabaneros, the elderly Latin-American whom Lillian had brought with us, in the chair next the aisle, and I feared that some instinct, some telepathic sense of the bitter hatred

Norman Graduate Wins Commission

Lieut. A. C. Shultz.

Arthur Christopher Shultz, who was given a commission as second lieutenant of infantry at the second officers' reserve training camp at Leon Springs, Texas, is 26 years old and is a graduate in pharmacy of the Oklahoma State University at Norman. He was a drug-gist in Dacoma, Okla., for three years. He has been a resident of Oklahoma City for one year.

that lay between us might bring recognition to her keen eyes.

What Lillian Said.

But not by a tremor of an eyelid did I betray the terror that was consuming me, and in another minute I heard Mr. Cabaneros murmur:

"You may look up now, she has turned around, and I am sure she did not recognize you. She is searching for some one, and is looking carefully at every person here. But she gave us only a casual glance."

Lillian struck into the conversation, but in the same subdued tones that marked all our utterances, tones which could not have been heard at the next table.

"Well," she said, "we have proved conclusively that she is in New York, and that settles to my mind the question of the newspaper clippings. There will be one forwarded from Marvin to your address tomorrow, Katherine, that's a certainty."

"And now, I wish I could take you girls home, but I am afraid it is impossible just now. Besides being unwise for us to rise and to go before them if we can possibly out-stay them, I must find out for whom she is searching so carefully. It may be of the utmost importance to me. And from now on, Mr. Cabaneros and I are going to carry on a conversation in Spanish about the most casual thing, so you will simply have to look as if you understood it and smile occasionally. How I wish you both could speak it. It would make things look more natural."

Who He Was.

"Perhaps I could help out a little," Katherine said modestly. "I was on a long case once in a Spanish family, a young girl with whom I spent months of convalescence, and I picked up a fair working knowledge of the language, although I'm a bit rusty."

Lillian gave her a searching glance, and I remembered the conversation she had held in Spanish with Mr. Cabaneros in the taxi cab, when she had naturally supposed both Katherine and me to be ignorant of the language. Had the two government secret agents—for such I was morally certain both Lillian and Mr. Cabaneros were—talked of things dangerous for any one outside the service to know? But in the next instant the searching glance gave way to a smile of approval, and I saw Lillian give my brother-cousin's little fiancée a surreptitious kindly pat on the hand.

"Bravo!" she said softly—and in another moment the three were engaged in an apparently animated conversation in Spanish. But I noticed that the eyes of both Lillian and Mr. Cabaneros lost nothing that came within their vision, and realized that they would know almost as soon as Grace Draper herself if the person for whom she was looking came into the room.

I had a curious breathless feeling as if I were witnessing an exciting race upon which some tremendously important stake depended. I think Katherine shared my feeling, to a lesser extent however, for she was absorbed in keeping up her end of the conversation Lillian wished carried on. But I had nothing to do save to pretend to listen to the others, and my eyes were free to wander wherever they pleased.

They rested more frequently upon Lillian's face than upon that of any one else, and thus it was that I saw a look of recognition and something else, something indefinable, flash into her eyes at some one or something behind me. She gave a quick, half-involuntary look at me, then as quickly averted her eyes, and I realized with a throb of excitement that the person she had seen was connected in some way in her mind with me.

Then next moment I understood the look, when, accompanied by two other men, there was ushered to a table not far from us, and directly opposite the one at which Grace Draper and Harry Underwood were seated, the man whom I knew as—Allen Drake.
